In high school and college, I studied journalism, which in turn introduced me to advertising. I quickly moved to the media side of the advertising market as I loved studying media patterns, demographics, sociology and trends. Trends seem to be coming at us faster and faster these days, as illustrated by the growth of websites, followed by blogs, followed by social networks and now social news. Twitter is a great example of social messaging that individuals get raw data and distribution, rather than having reporters filter and write about it for them. Thomas Baekdal recently published a long look at the history of information with a pretty well educated guess where the flow is going. As seen from the chart below, or by viewing the original article in the link above, he tracks the history of information from over the fence and local marketplace to newspapers/magazines, radio, television, web, blogs (already outdated?) to the newer and upcoming dominance of social media. While the past is given, the future is obviously harder to predict. Yet his observations are logical, with social media being the dominant force over the next decade. Useful reading. It can take years to learn art because students have to master writing Chinese characters, which is a daunting task in itself, and they must write a beautiful and ruthless tool: a brush. The art of calligraphy in China can be traced back to ancient Chinese signs and symbols that emerged 6,000 years ago, according to Wei Lu and Max Aiken in their essay, The Origins and Evolution of Chinese Writing Systems and Preliminary Relationship Counting. However, its modern form only emerged a few thousand years later, between the 14th and 15th th th edl states. There are seven main categories of traditional Chinese calligraphy—which include Hsin (pronounced xing), Sao (cao), Zuan (zhuan), Li, and Kai—each with their own slight variations in style and symbolism. As a result, the skill of writing beautiful calligraphy can be difficult for some students to understand, but fortunately there are a number of online resources for creating and editing Chinese calligraphy. Although the oldest-known calligraphy-like symbols date back to approximately 4,000,000 summonses, the traditional style of calligraphy that is still practiced today first appeared in Xiaoshuangqiao between 1,400 and 1,100 in front of the 1,100 front in modern-day Zhengzhou, China. Around 220 a.m., during Qin Shi Huang's reign in imperial China, a standard Chinese calligraphy system was adopted. As the country's first conqueror in China, Huang created a series of reforms, including the unification of a character that brought 3,300 standardized characters known as Xi Jinping (zhuan). From this point forward, writing in China has undergone a series of reforms that have brought a new set of standardized characters and inscriptions. Over the next two centuries, other styles evolved: Li's style (li) followed by the style of Kisiya (kai), followed by Xingshú (xing) and Cǎoshù (cao) cursive styles. Today, each of these forms is still used in traditional Chinese calligraphy practices, depending on the teacher and his preference for style and aesthetics. If you live in China, it's easy to find calligraphers who sell their jobs or who can create their own calligraphy just for you. is an easier way, though: tools that convert embedded text into calligraphy using different fonts.
